The long-rooted belief is that the domination determines and decides the shape, survival and sustenance of a language. The varied concrete forms of domination—be it political in the form of binary of rulers and ruled ones or economic comprising the dichotomy of the rich and the poor, or social consisting of the gap between the privileged and the downtrodden—have made the linguistic development happen. There is a need to shift our research interest towards collecting evidence from repertoire of the subalterneity which assert their advocacy about the choice of the particular phonemic, verbal or grammatical structure. It in interesting to see how the tribals plead for their linguistic formulations on the basis of simplicity and straight forward expression.

Involvement and motivations are the two basic requirements for successful classroom training. A teacher must work hard to evolve a suitable classroom pedagogy for successful learning and teaching. He must endeavour to project the ethos enshrined in great Indian epics and philosophies. He must also give space to Indian knowledge system in his teaching.
